An Inspiration Through Reading

I had always been an avid reader, often absorbed in my own worlds. I had never cared much about anything else. What was important to me was reading. Becoming lost in a story was the best way for me to choose my own path in life. Some days I was a Michelin star chef, cooking up a storm in the kitchen. Other days I was working as a trapeze artist, performing breathtaking tricks in the air. Wherever I was in my world of stories, I loved it.

Even after I had read multiple genres and styles I still couldn't decide my path in life. There were always too many options to choose from. My parents had told me many times since I was young that I could be anything when I grew up, but at the time I never had anything in mind. Still being indecisive at this moment I closed my eyes and thought about it long and hard. Images swirled through my head, appearing then disappearing. I took each option deep into consideration until I had a truly remarkable idea.

"That's what I want to be," I told myself.
"Nothing more and nothing less."
I wanted to inspire people and make others feel the same way when I read. I wanted to own a special book shop, one that was like no other before. I would become an author and sell my work for others to enjoy. Encouraging reading to all would be my goal. Though unlike any other book shop I would have a motto. "Read, grow, inspire."